Thirty-seven black and white Photographs of the Midwest Landscape by Art Sinsabaugh will be on exhibit in The Art Institute of Chicago from Friday, August 24 through Sunday, September 29, 1963.

The photographs in the exhibition, each 20 inches long and ranging from one to five inches high, disprove the contention that the midwest is flat and boring country. Sinsabaugh's work suggests the subtleties too often overlooked in a seemingly uneventful landscape. Using the midwest's long horizon line, broken by trees, houses, a slight rise of ground, a cemetery, he can convey a great variety of moods. Photographed in Indiana and Illinois between 1961 and 1963, the landscapes include farm scenes, a carnival panorama, a wide field of snow-covered stalks, the long thin lines of telephone poles and freight cars.

Sinsabaugh began work on his midwest project in 1952 when he was teaching at the Institute of Design, but found himself hampered by the limited scope of a standard camera. A summer fellowship at the University of Illinois permitted him to experiment further, and resulted in the strip format of the landscapes in the current exhibition, made from 12 by 20 inch negatives. He hopes in the future to photograph Chicago in the same manner.

Art Sinsabaugh was born in New Jersey in 1924, and began taking pictures when he was a boy. During high school he worked in a department store photo studio, and as a Junior Photographer for the War Department while he commuted to New York to study in a photography trade school. Drafted in 1943, he served for three years in the Army Air Force in the United States and Asia.

A graduate of the Institute of Design with a B.S. in Photography (1949), Sinsabaugh was invited to stay on to teach. From 1951 to 1959 he headed the Institute's Evening
